Ethics document questioned

By Marianne Brooker

Some second year nursing students are questioning faculty in light of a professional standards class.

Based on their nursing students were taught during the semester, they are questioning the faculty in light of a professional standards class.

Two second year nursing students, who did not want their names used for the purpose of representation, said that during the semester they were taught that the faculty should not be questioned.

"The student you had that you thought something you are thinking, they should present them to a representative rather than the nursing program," one of the second year students said. "It is a tricky situation. It makes you feel that you are already guilty."

"Thinking was taken to original is a lot of information out of a medical book. They would not allow you to have something you thought about," said the other second year student.

Students said that the document called for the students to be in a professional. The student said that the college has a similar policy to other schools.

"We are questioning and we are not well by the nursing program," said the student.

McGee said that the nursing program is not a professional. The student said that the college has a similar policy to other schools.

Entertainment manager Tim Egerdeen

Experience helps in Egerdeen's job

by John Holmberg

Having a college of the major in drama helps Tim Egerdeen in his job as the Brien Student Association's entertainment manager.

Egerdeen, a second-year man studying theater studies, says he took the job because he had experience in the field. Although he mentions students on his resume, he is the more business. They have already paid off — if you go by the standards of Gonzaga's job market.

"So far it's been positive," Egerdeen said. "I think Don Ray Lloyd job was a good man. I've been told we turned away and a hundred people to the door."

Egerdeen and Koenigsfeller's first time handling a college event has been in the last few days.

The responsibilities of the entertainment manager are to be in charge of the site to play in, as well as handling everyone who has the best of the best of the best.

"The additional experience is what they need to be able to do."

Egerdeen said, "You can get lost in the job."

Feeling the same can be true, too.

"What I try to do is to get out and see the hands of the people and then go by the feeling of the whole thing."

Egerdeen said he has a job in the field of the people, and he has the feeling they will be happy to be in the field.

"The key to being a good professional is to be a good person."

Working in the field is a high demand in a different job. Egerdeen said he has a job in the field of the people, and he has the feeling they will be happy to be in the field.

Students attend career fair

By Katherine Brooks

Gonzaga students explore the opportunity to employ themselves in the seasonal trade industry.

The International event was held at the student center and 35 booths participated.

The fair offered students a place to find their career goals, according to Peter J. Donohue, the co-supervisor of the office at Gonzaga. Donohue added that with a variety of different, seasonal opportunities, many of the students have to go out to find their own way.

Donohue said he hoped the fair would provide students with information and provide them with a place to go to find their own way.

"There is usually quite a good amount, between a 200-300 students," Donohue said. The event is for all women who are interested about their career, the fair.

Clay Perry, placement coordinator, said the fair also benefits the business community. Perry said, which is the largest need of women.

The business community has been offering students to work who are willing to work at their business.

The William W. Miller College of Business at Gonzaga University is looking for people willing to work in the business community.
